The effects of combinations of temperature and carbon source on morphology, protein and phage production, and phase variation were investigated in Listeria monocytogenes. Reaching stationary phase at 30 degrees C in a carbon source (glucose) that was depleted at 37 degrees C was found to be a condition sufficient to elicit morphologic changes in a strain possessing intact flagella (FL). Temperature-induced changes were similar in bacteria grown in glucose or in nutrient broths containing nonfermentable carbon sources (sucrose, lactose, or inulin). The FL requirement for morphologic changes was not universal, as the same morphologic changes were observed in bacteria growing in sucrose. However, temperature-induced morphologic changes in sucrose were less pronounced than in glucose. Transcription of two surface proteins (Hsp60 and PrfA) was dependent on temperature. Thus, morphologic changes were associated with changes in gene expression and served to alter the cell surface. Previous studies have shown that protein synthesis can be increased by more than 200% following temperature increases in either nutrient broths or when bacteria are transferred from 37 to 25 degrees C after reaching stationary phase at 37 degrees C. In the present work, increases in protein production associated with temperature shifts were observed in broth cultures containing glucose or sucrose but not in cultures containing nonfermentable carbon sources. In nutrient broths, protein synthesis was not affected by the addition of a carbon source not consumed by the bacterium. Flagella were required for changes in protein production, as phage were needed for temperature-induced protein accumulation. These results suggest that transfer from 37 to 25 degrees C in a glucose
